An electric wire (e.g. a twisted wire bundle) is plugged into a plug connector with a base part provided at one end and a contact part provided at the other end. In a conventional method of making the electric wire with the plug connector, the wire is inserted into a plug cover from one end thereof and is clamped at a first position of the base part. Subsequently, the wire is pushed in from another end thereof and is clamped at a second position of the base part. Next, the wire is pushed forward and is clamped at a third position of the base part. Further, the wire is pushed in from another end thereof and is clamped at a fourth position of the base part. Then, the wire is pushed forward again and is clamped at a fifth position of the base part. Thus, the wire is being pushed in and the wire is being clamped at the positions of the base part. With the conventional plug connector, the wire is being pushed in and is being clamped at the fifth position of the base part. Consequently, not only the wire is hard to pass through the contact part and the base part in advance, but also the wire is likely to easily slip off the plug connector when the wire is not pushed in any more. It is an object of the present invention to provide a plug connector which can avoid the wire from easily slipping off the plug connector in a process of making the electric wire with the plug connector. To achieve the above and other objects, a plug connector comprises a base part, a contact part, a plug cover, a mandrel, and a guide pin.

The base part has a first position, a second position, a third position, and a fourth position. The contact part is at the second position of the base part. The plug cover is provided at one end and the other end of the base part. The mandrel is disposed inside of the plug cover for guiding the wire along the base part, and a guide portion is disposed at the third position of the base part. The guide pin is provided in the guide portion of the base part for clamping the wire at the fourth position of the base part. With the plug connector constructed in this way, the wire is pushed f678ea9f9e
